In Android, I have a widget that contains three TextView widgets. I want the user to be able to select (i.e. use a key combination) one of the three TextView widgets (there are 3 radio buttons that are contained within the same widget). I'm using a Switch widget. The problem is, when a key combination is used, the user will be able to select either one of the radio buttons and then the other. The way to prevent this is to make the children of the Switch widget Focusable and FocusChangeListener, but that seems to have very poor usability - almost like the parent widget is no longer the selected widget! I found that by setting the Focusable of each of the three TextView widgets to true, this allows the TextView to receive focus when the key combination is used, but (1) focus cannot be changed from the TextView widget to the switch widget, (2) clicking one of the radio buttons will focus the parent switch widget instead of the child switch widget. I found this example, which has the same issue. I can come up with two ways of fixing it, neither of which are very elegant or clean, but perhaps someone has a good solution? Remove the Focusable property from the child widgets and have the "parent" widget receive focus when the key combination is used. Override the onClick() and onKeyDown() methods of the child widgets and return false. A: I've had similar issues and here's what I've found
