Don't Mean a Lot (2018) Indians have held different views about idols for thousands of years, but according to the mythology of the Hindu religion, the gods who dwelt on the earth before the time of Brahma were just like humans, and the oldest god is Brahma, who created the world. But there is also a God Brahma, who created the world. So was this an error in etymology? Do we need to view the occasion of the god Brahma the creation of the gods or of the worlds? He was always surrounded by all the gods at the same time. But no one knows how long it took to create the worlds. I told you that the Indian Brahmins also said you were two and that is why they questioned you. But can we really say that nothing is necessary? If there is no necessity, then how can you establish it in the thing itself? Vedic Indian philosophy is the point of view that no thing has an end, therefore, there is no necessity.

This is supported by the statements of the Indian Brahmins, and the nature of a thing is such that it is not necessarily accorded with these sentences, and the categories at which we are compelled to compel it are not a necessary basis. So, the result we came out of these points of view - or, to be precise, of a knowledge of ourselves - is that we are made to know neither necessity, nor that the world is created by necessity, nor that it created itself. We must stop and say that we really know nothing, neither necessity nor the creation of the world and all the creatures. We cannot really speak of it, we can only speculate, we have no certain knowledge, and these stories of the Brahmins to persuade us that these things exist or that they do not exist. We can say that we know nothing. Let us then know that these stories are not true, and we can try to convert the
