Information handling systems (IHS) are computer systems that assist individuals to efficiently manage daily life. Typically, an IHS contains software and data required for a given task. Once the software is loaded onto a hard disk drive (HDD), the data is stored thereon. The data is loaded into the HDD in a format suitable to be used by the application. A typical application comprises a program that displays images, such as a presentation from a computer, on a display screen. The image is loaded into the HDD as a data file. Image data files are typically large. It may take a relatively long time to transfer image data from the file system to the HDD. Thus, improvements in the efficiency of transferring data files to the HDD is useful.The two-layered structure of the human nevoid basal cell carcinoma syndrome.
