Recent events have shown that large-scale collaborative projects are good for people, for society, and for the environment. Yet, we need better tools to manage a world of increasingly complex collaborative projects. In Building Collage, Brenda Lee explains how building a collaborative team to build a concrete bird bath appeals to human nature and forces people to learn more about their strengths and weaknesses: "It is inevitable that we will need to collaborate, and this collaborative project provides an excellent opportunity to learn and build upon your strengths and weaknesses, and to develop new teamwork skills." Compiled by three professors from the University of Southern California, Building Collage raises issues about global collaboration and good practices, and it provides examples of how to create your own unique "collage." A team of designers, engineers, production supervisors, and others co-created the birdbath by "collaborating through the use of the Internet." The project required a big chunk of time for team members to communicate about a project and share their expertise to achieve the desired design. Because the project relied on the Internet for information and discussion, the designers were able to understand more about their clients. This provided the team a more realistic view of the competition and its needs. In most cases, teamwork and collaboration do not only benefit the people and the environment, but they are also good for the individual. Studies show that the potential to effectively collaborate can make the difference in someone's career. If people are able to build networks and share contacts, they are more likely to get a job. Collaborating also reduces the risk of making costly mistakes. With Building Collage, Brenda Lee presents some great examples of how to create your own distinctive collaborative projects and teams. Learn how people collaborate and create project charters, and learn how the project got started, created a vision, and developed teams.Q: How to make this call asynchronous in JQuery I am trying to call an asynchronous call to check if the email address is already in use.
